Dear Maria, Igor and Vitaliy,

I have had a chance to think over your offer. I would be pleased to help out as a technical advisor. However, I'm a full time employee at Abbott Labs and a directorship would be too much for me to handle right now-especially for a startup company. I also think you would be better positioned to have some deeper business/professional skills involved such as accounting, advertising, legal and management. I believe these would help you more to position yourselves quickly to start a going concern. In addition, other major investors who come along should be given board positions if they have the requisite skills and interest. Another point: I think someone younger than myself could commit more energy. Monthly meetings are just not enough for a startup company in my opinion and I doubt I could respond more often.

Sincerely,
David Wender
